Architecture is, in the first place, a process of thinking. And by the nature of practice, it is unavoidably a consequence of certain existing, specific conditions. Research and response to those becomes the ultimate generative tool aiming to challenge the obvious. Therefore there is no style but rather a systematic design approach, where each project is an individual and unique case rethinking various entities - spatial, social, material, historical, typological, climatic etc. Our work spans different scales and programs as well as diverse climates and localities of which understanding is crucial for any subtle reaction within the codes of each specific context. Either physical or mental, real or abstract, the codes of context define the grounds for the work of architecture yet to be.
